Women of New France 5: Music, Dance, and Diversions

Stacey Moore

Western Michigan University, stacey.l.moore@wmich.edu

Fort St. Joseph Archaeological Project

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.wmich.edu/fortstjoseph

Part of the American Material Culture Commons, Archaeological Anthropology Commons, European History Commons, History of Gender Commons, Social History Commons, Women's History Commons, and the Women's Studies Commons

WMU ScholarWorks Citation

https://scholarworks.wmich.edu/fortstjoseph/16

This Exhibition is brought to you for free and open access by the Intercultural and Anthropological Studies at ScholarWorks at WMU. It has been accepted for inclusion in Fort St. Joseph Archaeological Project by an authorized administrator of ScholarWorks at WMU. For more information, please contact wmu-scholarworks@wmich.edu.
Music
Music was an important part of a young woman’s education in the 18th century. Society frowned on wind instruments for ladies—they looked too disagreeable with puffed out cheeks—but approved of string instruments and vocal music. If a young woman’s family had the financial resources she would learn to play the harpsichord. Violins or fiddles and guitars were far more common.

Dance
Dancing was very popular in New France. Even at frontier posts like Fort St. Joseph, the habitants wanted to learn the latest dances of Europe. In Europe and the larger towns in the New World, wealthy people hired dancing masters to teach themselves and their children the proper dance steps. Frontier settlers acquired books detailing the latest dances and how to perform them. For example, the habitants at Fort Michilimackinac held dances at least once a week. Priests throughout New France railed against the French love of dancing, all to no avail.

“[The men were] engaged in drinking brandy by the full bowl from which they were all drunk together, that during this debauchery Boudor had been gambling against Guilhebaud [who lost] ten packs of beaver…he had good reason to judge that Guilhebaud had drank to excess…because of the error that he had noticed that Guilhebaud made in the way he played his trump [card]…”
~ Witness testimony, Fezeret v. Boudor, 1700

Diversion
Games were popular pastimes that women and men enjoyed. Gaming pieces made of bone, similar to those used by Potawatomi women well into the 20th century, have been recovered from Fort St. Joseph. Archaeologists surmise that these were left by the wives of French fur traders from neighboring tribes. Card games were also extremely popular and, at the fur trade posts, were often accompanied by drinking and gambling.