Acknowledgments

This book presents my passionate commitment to recognizing what I do not know, that I do not know. It also documents a lifelong interest in how people communicate, why we trust or distrust one another, and in what belief might be. My scholarly life has grown with the transdisciplinary and interdisciplinary movements of the past fifty years, and these acknowledgments should take up the space of another book, so I will keep them short.

The rich and diverse academic environment of the International Society for the History of Rhetoric has been key to this book. Diane Macdonnel, and at the University of Leeds Institute for Bibliography and Textual Studies, John Barnard and Jonathan Sanderson, were central to my work in the history of the book. The second home for this book has been the University of California Davis, and I thank the Office of Research for grant support. The many colleagues I met through the emerging field of gender and sexuality studies led me to situated work inspired by Hilary Rose in science and technology, Danielle Fuller in reading and texts, and Maxine Craig in women and critical race. In performance studies I was helped by Stephen Morton, Susan Kelly, and Janelle Reinelt, crossing into afropessimism with Frank Wilderson III.

The work on household books was initially encouraged by Alan Davidson, who taught me confidence and diplomatic strategy. This work would never have flowered without the support of Dena Attar and Elizabeth Driver, and, later on, the editor Erika Gaffney. Lesley Johnson opened the doors to women's history for me, Ilya Noé the cover art maker has held my thinking heart, Naomi Janowitz has kept me intellectually alert, duskin drum sustained the initial impetus for this book, and my ongoing guide through Shakespeare's texts and through life has been Peter Lichtenfels.

Each of these persons I consider a friend, and I warmly thank all the unexpected friends and families for rooting the book in its critical positionality and living process.
