July 2014

The First Fall

Ayla Batton

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarworks.wmich.edu/laureate Part of the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation
Batton, Ayla (2014) "The First Fall," The Laureate: Vol. 9, Article 41.
Available at: http://scholarworks.wmich.edu/laureate/vol9/iss1/41

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the Lee Honors College at ScholarWorks at WMU. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Laureate by an authorized administrator of ScholarWorks at WMU. For more information, please contact maira.bundza@wmich.edu.
In the evening,
we stood on corners with an upturned umbrella, fingers reaching, mouths watering wakefully, smelling the moment before the sun is overtaken by clouds. The first fall it rained and rained until even the streets were sleeping underwater. My Newfoundland wet pawed through sidewalks and slick grass around our valley home. He pushed the ambivalent oak with plaintive songs until the weighted branches hung low over the sunken streets full of empty water and leaves and white sticks knocked from hands.

The trees are heavy in the fall with Japanese beetles and sorrow. The abandoned thoughts of the valley float full and opaque over the silent, hungry water like rice paper lanterns waiting to be swallowed, then remembered.

I always know when we two are close to home because all the streets are downhill.
Sometimes my yoked dog pulls me over broken acorns and glass and rain water and I let the little moons lift from the branches to follow me home.

— Ayla Batton