How to Be Held

The room’s so thickly shadowed, as in memory, that any point of focus dissipates beneath my gaze:

the soft click of the rocking chair, irregular against the humming of the box-fan, and the murmur of occasional cars along the avenue, secures me in my faith the ceiling holds above us, somewhere, that the woven blankets I’ve nailed across the window to keep the shadows in, and help my son to sleep, still hang. On my bad days, I would call the constellations my mind conceives to root itself in place no more than an illusion, the lines I trace between his weight against my chest, the walls concealed in the dark beyond us, and the sidewalks, so accustomed to our steps, below, no more than an imagined safety.

The route from home to homeless is too trivial a distance to be measured, the way an injury can be revealed in total stillness—fractures due to loss of bone mass, say—or how, at thirty, I can’t recall a single night my mother held me, though I know they numbered in the hundreds. What could those arms, which then seemed limitless in strength, have gifted me but reassurance, through the tenderness of my containment, that my breaths were little harmonies beneath her breath, and that the roof would keep the wind out, if only for a single evening, so I, in my ease, could free-fall to a heavy rest, as my son does now, as I gently double over, lips pressed to his still-wet hair, to lower him toward the dark warmth of his crib.

The silent movie of my dream recedes.
A noise like a disposal crushing glass wakes me with a start. Muddled cries spill from the monitor beside the bed.

When I rise to draw the blind, there’s nothing, beyond the empty bus stop and the dubbed yards of grass, sick as newsprint beneath the streetlight’s buzz.

Some incidents of sense are inexplicable:

Four hours ago, a dozen strangers shuffle off the bus, and migrate from the curb to the apartment complex across the road, stopping traffic like a parade, or a herd of deer, like the spectacle of fire among the trees—

In 1999, a pastor told me of a hole inside my heart, a dark space only faith in god could fill.

Imagine my unhappiness to find, years later, he was partly right. The hole was never in my heart, but in the afterlife which, years into imagining, I still found difficult to picture. The hole was in the locales on the nightly news, and how they never looked much like my neighborhood, the misplaced history of what’s happened in-between so many wars. For the infinity of childhood, the world expands up and out forever, beyond the whispered consolation of our parents, the cracking drywall, the backyard’s maple trees and swingset, beyond the neighbors and their leaky pool, the takeout joints and counters, beyond the highway, too, and into hypotheticals, the places built more from assumption than from earth, until, one day, the world begins contracting.

Even the city’s cleanest corners bloat with the grief of their own impermanence, crying out at nightfall through the blank stare of the billboards and neon lights.

We stumble down the sidewalk like bargain gumshoes, scrutinizing the alleys for something that’s been lost though we’ve forgotten what, only certain of its being in our lack. I forget myself to sleep and wake past comfort, adrift, the sickness too entrenched for treatment. The hole is in the surf, unsettled, where a raft of refugees submerged mere miles off unfriendly coast. The hole is in the weakening smile of the boy, dying of leukemia, I sat behind in third grade, and in the hollow peace of how, yesterday, I didn’t recognize him in my yearbook, features clouded when I look too close.

What can I call this impulse to unwrap motif?
In the waiting room, bubblegum cigars sit bunched inside their little blue box, each a fuzzy reproduction of the other, beside a vase of wilting roses.

The petals drop at their own uneven pace, each unique in its design like the strange array of faces gathered here, plucked from disparate moments in my history, reclining together over islands of chairs.

Distant relatives, acquaintances, and friends converge, some laughing over half-emptyed cups of coffee, some rocking absent-mindedly or pacing, anxious for a glimpse, however fleeting, of the familiar stranger sprawled against my chest, of the way his eyes, untrained to process all but light and motion, are a match for mine, of how even this cluttered room invokes collage, each distinctive shape emerging to the sterile canvas until, somehow, a whole becomes discernible, a structure unfolding from the darkness that will hold him when my arms no longer can.
