4.14.21 - spring

Clayton Meldrum
Western Michigan University

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.wmich.edu/hilltopreview

Preferred Citation Style (e.g. APA, MLA, Chicago, etc.)
N/A

This Creative Writing is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate College at ScholarWorks at WMU. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Hilltop Review by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at WMU. For more information, please contact wmu-scholarworks@wmich.edu.
This creative writing is available in The Hilltop Review: https://scholarworks.wmich.edu/hilltopreview/vol12/iss2/16
Spring – 3/14/21

Winter is receding… slowly.

I no longer rely on fires to fight the freezing, thawing numbness to pain to exhaustion, as my body comes back into itself.

I no longer rely on layers to keep my skin protected from the biting chill, oblivious to the cold.

That occasional gust, slipped between the seams, to remind my being “It’s still winter. Your coat can’t cover you, not completely.”

Winter is receding… surely.

I can begin to imagine a warm sunny day, but not yet. It is still cold. It is still wet. I am still cold. Not yet.

A new season is stirring, maturing, until it is ready to come, as every season does. I start to see the sun, but not yet to feel her warmth. It is right there though. Any day now.

Any day now, it will pour through the window with a promise. And blow through the opening door with a different kind of gust, a different air, a different care.

Not how to survive another winter day Yet not to thrive in other summer day But yet derive some other way, something in between - spring

To wear one less layer not because it is warm enough yet, but because it is less cold than yesterday. The sun is starting to work again, summer is going to come and I’m tired of fire. My skin needs sun.

Seasons, seasons, seasons…

no more on seasons who will come and go the same they do not need poems