The Wings of an Angel

Heather Herrick

Western Michigan University

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarworks.wmich.edu/calliope

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: http://scholarworks.wmich.edu/calliope/vol1992/iss1/21
Walking along the unsheltered shoreline, the wind scattering litter on the beach.

I notice a black and white feather, playing tag with someone’s old Sunday comics.

Tom, an old Indian friend, once bound together two feathers like that.

Ceremoniously, twisting strips of leather between them.

When he finished, he held in his hands a pair of angel’s wings.

We hid them. He said we’d get them later, at a time unknown to both of us.
But I forgot those angel wings.
I guess Tom didn’t.

Because he placed them
on my Grandma’s chest,
just before they buried her.

Tom told me not to worry anymore.
He said that Grandma
sure did make
one heck of an angel.

We went home
and Tom showed me how to carve
a whistle out of wood.

But that day is gone,
and I’m just standing
here with some
stupid feather
in my hand.

Right now I wish I could be with Grandma, instead of being alone with my shallow memories.

by Heather Herrick