Homer Spit June, 1978

Karen Willmes
East Grand Rapids High School

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarworks.wmich.edu/calliope
Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://scholarworks.wmich.edu/calliope/vol1980/iss1/16

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by the English at ScholarWorks at WMU. It has been accepted for inclusion in Calliope by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at WMU. For more information, please contact maira.bundza@wmich.edu.
Homer Spit
June, 1978

Homer Spit: a narrow tongue of land jutting out into the water between the great V of the mountains.
The second most commercial place in Alaska: rows of seafood stands, seafood shacks, campgrounds & motorhomes.

It was the morning of the longest day and the lowest tide of the year.

I went beachcombing.
Sharp edges of seashells clenched in my hand,
I collected amber-green kelp,
the claw of a crab, spotty pink,
the vertebrae of a deep-water halibut.
   My treasures that morning were wet and fishy-smelling.

I shared the morning with gulls screeching like fishwives.
At the end of the pier
men were unloading the trawler.
Yet there was a quality of silence and stillness and morning was a special light.

A man sat on the beach with 42 crabs
in white buckets about him.
He hacked each still-groping body in half with an axe.
These here are Dungusse crabs he said
Some folks like 'em better than Alaskan King.

It was a morning
for looking at mountains
and their reflections on the water.
It was a morning for looking at the water and at the shore.

Karen L. Willmes