Spring 1956

A Roman Enters In

Pete Cooper
Western Michigan University

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.wmich.edu/calliope

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarworks.wmich.edu/calliope/vol3/iss2/19
MY POET

My Poet is a hush old man who is not dead.
My Poet is a child who calls
his father Pain,
his mother Beauty,
who calls his Brothers to come home again.

Stone, bone, and mist below
My poet grows on,
and sings the sun around each cradle,
shouts out the hope from graves.

My Poet knows
as earth knows,
And spits his spite on irons
and on air.
And dies tomorrow, writhing song.

A ROMAN ENTERS IN

Beneath the rich, full robes
Flash-tied to tired old shoulders,
Hung his huge white hands.
Taunt, white, and positive hands
With only a drop of doubt in each broad palm
Nor was the firm face sure,
For all the bold power that weighed
On those great shoulders.
Yielding no awe to the guardian,
He asked, "Is there a Nazarene
Come before me called Jesus?"
And to the answer,
"It is as I thought."
And the face and the white hands
Received the knowledge finally,
And Pilate entered in.

Pete Cooper