Identifying Nonprofit Resource Allocation Practices

The descriptive study analyzes the relationship between the funds spent by local nonprofits to attend and network at cost-based events organized by other community entities and the benefits gained for participating in that event.

Answering:
- Is allocating resources to networking events worth it?
- What expectations do nonprofit leaders have of networking?
- Do nonprofit leaders believe there is value to participating in these events to raise awareness, funds and additional resources?

The research provides a basis for budgeting decisions as it relates to allocating funds toward cost-based, non-mission specific, networking events.

Methodology

- Electronic survey/10 questions
- Nonprofit organization’s senior executives
- Greater west Michigan metropolitan region
- 107 organizations received
- 34 nonprofits responded (32% return)

To minimize sample selection bias we partnered with a county-wide agency that provides management support, resources and services to nonprofit organizations and a local public relations professional for distribution of survey.

Cost-Based and Non-Mission networking events:
Other community organization (for-profit or nonprofit) events that are not specific to the mission of the participating nonprofit and that have a monetary cost to attend.

Event examples:
- Galas
- Golf Outings
- Rotary
- Chamber Functions
- Luncheons
- Award Celebrations

Conclusion

The findings support that the funds allocated to cost-based networking events do show an impact in the resource generation outcomes.

By challenging the current resource allocation practices and networking behavior within the nonprofit organization the independent sector is likely to experience a growth in financial contributions, program partners, and community engagement.
