2017

Her Black Braids Broke Down

Casey Grooten

Western Michigan University, casey.l.grooten@wmich.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarworks.wmich.edu/laureate

Part of the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation

Grooten, Casey (2017) "Her Black Braids Broke Down," The Laureate: Vol. 16 , Article 16. Available at: http://scholarworks.wmich.edu/laureate/vol16/iss1/16
No one will remember me, she thought.

She hangs upside down, rain water collects in her open mouth, behind her teeth.

She researches family members who exhibited sociopathic tendencies. Lights a lantern outside the bedroom door at night to be certain no spirit steals her intentions, written on moleskins, under a pillow.

Dad kissed her on the head and asked “Why does your upper lip always itch?” Still asks herself this question, there are a million answers.

He said it’s because she couldn’t keep quiet, always opened doors with stolen keys. Theft is a common theme in her life, whether it be a pair of gold hoop earrings, heavy, lion-head shaped clasps, or any man with a dagger hanging between his legs.

She wrote a novel every time he breathed onto her neck in the nighttime.

...her black braids broke down, her memory, her 2928.

1. Here’s winter; you can’t dance in the park. At dawn you swayed beneath a willow tree before I knew the way your fingers felt on my temple. I passed you, toward the woods, the only time I’ve ever seen you dance. I still can’t appreciate the technicality of your art but in that universal moment when you moved like curiosity and rain I carried that with me through the labyrinth of maples and I don’t think it’ll ever leave me. My head doesn’t ache, but thrashes, perhaps imploding always.

I’d curl up in the dark and hurt. You’d use peppermint oil to calm me, then smile and go practice in the living room. I never saw you, I couldn’t leave the bed, but I heard your movement. Thinking of you in motion distracted me. I’m still grateful for that.

2. I’m picking the nails off my toes in the room where you started using acrylic. You shared your paintings with me, and they were good. Their ghosts flicker on my ceiling at night. I’m gluing my torn off toenails on a blank canvas you left in the closet. I arrange them in a pyramid. My toes dangle over the canvas and fill the pyramid with blood drops. I continue this routine until I stop bleeding. There’s nowhere near enough blood, far too much negative space. I squeeze my feet with my hands, force more. You always admired texture, always touched mess just to feel it; fingers stained watercolor.

3. If I do this every night, I’ll never dance for anyone. This is my alleviation from fractured nerves. It empties me to imagine you dancing for anyone else, letting them see what I never could. I know you’ll want to give your dancing. I’ll swallow all of these paintings, show them to no one if you promise you will dance only for shadows of silhouettes.